ABSTRACT

Education is the process of obtaining and passing on information through formal instruction, such as that provided in a classroom setting. Information on how to find and prepare food, build shelter, create weapons and other tools, acquire a common language, and internalise the norms and practises of a particular culture's religion and moral code were all part of the first forms of education. People had to constantly fight for their lives against the elements, other animals, and other humans before the creation of reading and writing. Preliterate societies' survival strategies matured into the cultural and educational norms we know today. Survival and the search for knowledge led to the birth of education. Depending on context, it might be professional or casual. The term "informal education" is used to describe the way in which people as a whole learn the norms and conventions of a certain culture. The term "formal education" is commonly used to describe how pupils are educated in schools and universities.
